

WARNING

Don't become the next cave diving accident statistic! Stay well within your training and experience level.

- Diving in overhead environments, such as caverns and caves, is an extremely hazardous activity. Every site on this map has been the scene of multiple diver fatalities. Ninety percent of these fatalities involve divers with no formal training in cavern or cave diving.
- There are only four sites on this map—Ginnie Spring, Devil's Den, Blue Grotto and Paradise Spring—where experts consider it acceptable for divers who lack formal Cavern or Cave Diver training to enter the water with dive lights and explore underwater caverns. Even at these sites, it is important divers keep the cavern entrance clearly in view at all times.
- At any site other than these four, divers who lack Cavern or Cave Diver certification should not enter the water with dive lights. Doing so will help prevent them from accidentally going where they may not be able to find their way out. Several sites rigidly enforce a No Lights rule to help keep divers safe.
- For more information on exploring underwater caverns and caves as safely as possible, visit The Cave Diving Website at www.CaveDiving.com.
